LOUISVILLE, May 15 .- Colonel Jacob, in Sunday's fight with the rebels Cluke and Chenault, at Horse Shoe Bottom Narrows, on the Cumberland river, lost forty-two men, including three officers.

Captain Chenault and several other rebel officers and ninety-eight men were killed and three rebel prisoners taken. General John H. Morgan was in command, with nine regiments, aggregating four thousand, which are still on the south side of the Cumberland, only small squads having crossed at different points. Colonel Graham, at Glasgow, killed several rebels and drove two hundred to the south side of the Cumberland, on Wednesday. There is no considerable force on the north side of the Cumberland.

Morgan purposed going into Kentucky, but has been defeated by the forces of Cols. Boyle and Holman, and the Twentieth Michigan, un-der Colonel Jacob, at the Narrows.

INGTON DELEGATION.

SPEECH OF MR. UTERMEHLE.

[From the New York Herald.] Pursuant to announcement, the deputation of citizens of Washington charged with the duty of presenting to Major General McClellan a copy of complimentary resolutions adopted by the Common Council of that city waited upon that distinguished officer at a late hour yesterday atternoon, at his residence in West Thirtyfirst street, and formally made the presentation. The deputation was composed of some twenty or thirty gentlemen, including a number of New York celebrities, besides members of the Washington Common Council and militia. Having published the resolutions, as well as the names of all the members of the deputation, in yesterday's issue, it is unnecessary to repeat them in this connection. It is enough to state that the resolutions were engrossed in the most artistic manner possible, and framed with equal taste and elegance. The parties who were instrumental in getting up the entire arrangement deserve the highest praise for the good taste and judgment which they have displayed. About five o'clock in the afternoon some eight or ten carriages drove up to the Metropolitan Hotel, and the members of the deputation, decorated with whiteribbon ties and accompanied by their friends, immediately departed for the residence of General McClellan, which they reached in due season, after a pleasant drive through a portion of ritth avenue.

The General received his visitors in the most cordial manner. He was dressed in a neat black suit, and looked much better than on any public occasion since his arrival in this city. General Fitz John Porter, Mr. George McLean, and a few members of his Staff were present by the side of their old chief and some four or five distinguished citizens were also in attendance. Mr. Charles H. Utermehle, a lawyer of Washington, acted as chairman and spokesman of the delegation. He introduced each member of the committee to the General, after which he proceeded in a very appropriate speech to make the presentation. He said that as chairman of the delegation it was his pleasant duty to present to the General a copy of a joint resolution adopted by the Aldermen and Common Council of Washington, as an evi-dence of their appreciation of the distinguished services he had rendered that city. When, in 1861, the Government summoned Gen. McClelian to the defence of Washington, the army was in a completely disorganized condition, and the Capital was in the utmost peril. Yet in a very brief period peace and order were re-stored, and the enemy instead of continuing to threaten Washington, were soon forced to rush to the defence of their own Capital. He availed himself of the present opportunity to repudiate the imputations cast upon the loyalty of Wash-ington. The charge of disloyalty which had been basely insinuated had no foundation in fact or truth. When the first cloud of Secession appeared in the Southern horizon, the citizens of Washington felt a deep interest in the cause of the National Government, and when the Capital was in danger contributed men and money with the utmost liberality for its defence. The citizens of Washington regarded themselves as the wards of the United States Government, and therefore had a deeper interest in the integrity of that Government than any other portion of the country.

The speaker then reviewed at length nearly all the events which occurred from the time of Gen. McClellan's advance towards Richmond down to the period of his removal after the memorable campaign in Maryland, and referred in eloquent terms to the signal services rendered to the organizer of the Army of the Potemac, and his repeated rescue of the National Capital from the danger with which it was threatened of falling into the hands of the Rubels. After expressing the hope that the time would again arrive wh n the feneral would again be found at the head of the army

The speech of Mr. Utermehle was frequently and heartily applauded.

Gen. McClellan replied as follows:

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: It is with unusual pride and satisfaction that I receive this testimony of the confidence of the citizens of Washington, not only because it is the capital of our nation, but because, as your chairman has hardly adequately expressed, you were the first who were thrown directly in the path of this civil war, and thus made to bear the first trunt. Had you not proved faithful to your trust and truly loyal, our capital would have gene before the North could have raised its hand to save it. I never have thought that st fficient justice has been done to the citizens of Washington in this regard, but history will do you justice as your own consciences do now. I hope no instance will ever arise when you shall feel called upon to defend your leyalty; that thought is too universally conceded to permit any one to be base enough to doubt it. It is true I once did find Washington threatened by a victorious army. It is true that most of the anxious hours of my life and probably my most harassing labors have been spent in trying to secure the safety of Washington. That it was secured was due entirely to the callant troops I had the hours to see to the gallant troops I had the honor to com-mand. I take this high honor as one paid to them, and regard myself in this case as merely their representative or exponent, to whom you choose to present this. I know they will feel well rewarded for all their dangers and trials when knowing that those most vitally interested in the safety of Washington were satisfied with what we did. I feel doubly honored that so many of you have taken the trouble to make this long journey to do me this honor. I have not words to express my feelings in this case. It is an honor higher and greater than I deserve. I trust you will receive my most heartfelt thanks, and convey to the Boards of Alder-men and Councilmen and to the citizens of Washington my warm and sincere thanks; and I hope that the fortunes of war shall never again make it necessary that I shall be called to the defence of the capital. I hope Washing-ton shall never again be threatened by any hosile force, either springing from the bosom of our own country or coming from some foreign land, and that your dangers and trials are over

The short speech of the General was listened to with the profoundest attention, and not until he concluded the last syllable did his audience indulge in the slightest demonstrations of ap-

A general conversation next followed. The General inspected the magnificently framed copy of the resolution, and expressed himself highly pleased and gratified. Wine next came, and for half an hour or more the deputation indulged in the most agreeable festivities. drinking the health of Gen. McClellan, perpetnity of the Union, and success to the Army of the Potomac

Gen. McClellan and Gen. Porter were asked many questions relative to the state of the country, and replied with the utmost frankness. Some one asked if there was any doubt about the death of "Stonewall Jackson." General

McClellan replied that he thought not, and expressed himself much grieved at the event. "No one," said he, "can help admiring a man like Jackson. He was sincere, and true and valiant. Yet no one has disappointed me more than he has. Jackson was one of my classmates, and at college never promised to be the man he has proved himself. He was always very slow, and acquired a lesson only after great labor. And yet his determination was so great that he never gave anything up until he had succeeded. His character seems to have changed since; for he has exhibited great celerity in all his motements while in command of the rebel forces." "I suppose," remarked a gentleman, "Jackon was the ablest General in the South.' "He is undoubtedly a great loss to the reb-els," replied Gen. McGellan. "Lee is per-haps the most able commander they have, and Jackson was their best executive officer. The conversation next turned on the famous flight of President Lincoln from Harrisburg to Washington, and the state of the National Capitol at the time of the inauguration. Gen. McClellan, in reply to various questions, stated that at the time referred to he did not think there was much danger either to the person of President Lincoln or to the Capital. Since then he had however obtained information which led him to believe that there really was a conspiracy to seize the person of Lincoln and gain possession of Washington. Had either event occurred, the effect might have changed the whole character of events, and resulted in the Southern conspirators becoming given the Rebels a moral force equal to three hundred thousand men. A gentleman inquired if there would be any impropriety in asking whether the rumor that General McClellan had tendered his resignation to the President was true or false? The General promptly answered. "The ru mor has not the slightest foundation in fact." After some further conversation the deputa-

Miss Bateman. LATE FROM GEN. GRANT'S DEPART-

Movements of Grant's Army-Jackson. Miss., Probably Invested, and the only Mode of Retreat Open to the Rebels is up the Yazoo River.

Caino, ILL., May 12 .- Intelligence from the army under Maj. Gen. Grant indicates that there has been no more important movement during the war than that recently accomplished in Mississippi. In order that its importance may be fully comprehended, a resume of events may be necessary. It will probably be remembered that after Gen. Grant, with his army. reached New Carthage, several gunboats and transports ran the batteries and arrived at Grand Gulf, a place on the Mississippi river, where the Big Black river empties into it. There the rebels had thrown up strong fortilications and pronounced them impregnable.

The gun-boats, according to the plan, made an attack in front, white a portion of General Grant's army took them in the rear. The battle was a short one, but inflicted a severe punishment on the Rebels. The army was then ordered to move, and captured Bruinsburg, Port Gibson, Bayon Pierre and Rodney. The next thing in order, according to the programme, was to march to the rear of Vicksburg. In order to prevent this, the Rebels, estimated at ten thousand in number, occupied and endeavored to hold to the woods about five miles Port Gibson.

The country is quite hilly, and ravines and bayous tend to make it very difficult to move large bodies of men over it. The Federals advanced cautiously, till they came up to the enemy, and, before the Rebel commander was fully aware of the approach of three thousand Federals, the attack was made. The superior force of the foe, and the nneven face of the field, rendered the attack hazardous; but with an unyielding determination to succeed, the brave sons of the West pushed forward, and, with vell and shouts of "victory or death," rushed upon the enemy. An eye-witness of the fight, a man who has melt gunpowder in several closely contested battles, says he never saw a more glorious scene

The Rebels, when our forces fell on them, were borne backward in confusion, and compelled to abandon their dead and wounded. A rebel captain says, that out of ninety-six men, only twenty-four of his men escaped unbart. The Federals captured four hundred and twenty-eight priseners and four pieces of artillery. The loss in killed and wennded was six hundred. It is impossible to tell the Rebel loss. After this conflict the army pushed forward, capturing stranglers and destroying the bridge over the Big Black River, at Nicholsville. From this point they went on, and burned the railroad bridge over the same etream, also, two and a half miles of trestle work.

The Jackson Appeal, of the 6th, contains an editorial on the success of General Grant, which closes by saying that, ent will now be conceded that civilians know at least what is best for the protection of their immediate country." The same editorial places Gen. Grant at the head and front of the Federals. It is probable that Jackson is now invested, and the only mode of retreat open to the Rebels in Vicksburg is up the Yazoo river. Even there they will be saidouly for a short time, for Gens. Grant and Dodge will soon hunt them out.
